A child's Early Years are what lays the foundation for everything that comes later in his or her life. Over time, researchers have discovered that learned human brain development and its vast majority of neurons are what's most receptive for their learning capability. This happens during the time of birth up to three years old. A childâ€™s intake of most new information is considered critical to neural pathway formation - a fundamental aspect to learning ability.

Apple Tree Day School in San Antonio understands that education plays a vital role in the development period of every child. Research since the early part of the 20th century has linked early learning intervention to both emotional and cognitive skills which are instrumental in the success of early childhood educational programs.

During the last four decades, a great number of new principles and practices have been developed for use in classrooms with young children. In addition, a never-ending amount of books, and media, such as videos have been developed to assist with developing activities for use in the home.

However, it has been found that most early childhood home settings are not able to provide the degree of language opportunity that children require. An early learning center knows that language is the first and foremost skill that children need instruction with. In fact, studies have overwhelmingly shown a difference in those children who have access to an early learning center, as opposed to those who do not.

Based on the â€œMeaningful Differences in the Everyday Experience of Young American Childrenâ€• stud conducted by Hart and Risleyin 1995, parents typically speak between just a few words, at the lower end, to 300 maximum words each hour to their children. However, only a few children are privileged to have a high level of verbal interaction with their parents during their early stages.

Even at the highest level, children home based environments don't have adequate access to communicating with others at their same level and above. Nor have they got access to other critical learning devices, including group interaction and specific lesson plans constructed by early education center specialists.

Truly adequate instruction during early childhood involves an intensive, high quality form. When these learning requirements are not addressed, learning problems may occur that could have easily been avoided with proper instruction. Many parents are simply not equipped with the time or resources to adequately notice and reverse any negative cycles that exists in the home environment as to learning.

Children should develop the most efficient essential decoding learning processes as early as possible. The children who are able to do this are far more likely to be capable of paying attention to textual meaning. With that ability comes the result that they'll read more and practice reading which in turn ensures they are better at it. All of that activity leads to learning and enjoying reading and appreciating all that it has to offer. Reading is the first aspect of learning that children must master, since it is this skill that assists with learning every other subject.

Several places, including San Antonio, have considered plans to implement universally designed early development preschool programs. Within the last five years, the U.S. government has produced several essential books on early childhood education, just like those that are taught at most early learning centers.

Apple Tree DaySchool in San Antonio's goal is to consistently make contributions toward the development of the most effective child education practices during the most crucial time of a childâ€™s life which is the beginning.
