Some people may be eager about their renovations that have to do with vinyl fabrics. Vinyl is great because of how cost effective it is, and how durable it is. However, many people don't necessarily know what the difference between different grades of vinyl actually is. This article will help you understand what marine grade vinyl is. Yachtsman marine vinyl is an example of one type of marine vinyl in particular.

Vinyl upholstery is something that many people overlook at times, because they assume prematurely that it will look cheap or as if it is only an imitation of leather or some finer material. Vinyl when it is done right, however, can be just as good or better than other materials, especially when it comes to marine grade vinyl fabric, including our Yachtsman marine vinyl that you can find at All Vinyl Fabrics. This blog will discuss some of the uses for your Yachtsman vinyl or other types of marine grade vinyl. So most marine vinyls have a standard weight of being about 25-30 ounces per lineal yard. That means that this type of vinyl is actually the heaviest available. The heavier the vinyl, the more durable it is, naturally. This vinyl including Yachtsman vinyl was developed to withstand the harsh environments that you'll encounter in boating and awning industries. The vinyl must meet these certain requirements that have to do with UV and weather resistance; stabilized pigment rating; weight; thickness; cold crack rating; and abrasion resistance. These factors contribute to the long-lifespan of marine grade vinyl.

A quality marine grade vinyl will have the fabric sewn together using a high-quality thread to go with it. This is as opposed to a heat or melting of the fabrics together. Often when boats are left out on a cold night, you can get cracking or freezing of the heated parts. The constant heating and cooling of the seam can cause it to lose its durability. Sewing means that the thread will remain a thread no matter what. Marine vinyl flooring has the vinyl fabric appearance of outdoor carpeting and floors. This is about the basics of marine grade vinyl fabric. With this in mind, you can apply your choice to the renovation most relevant, choosing your color and design with ease, because you already know which type of vinyl you'll need. The rest is fun. You can think about applying Yachtsman or other marine grade vinyl to your boating and nautical areas, but you can also consider it for another area of your house or office that you'd like to be extra strong and able to endure weather. This will mostly be in outside applications, but could additionally be indoors, when you know there will be small children frequently using a room or that the room will be used harshly. This vinyl is all about endurance!
