A muscle car is typically a mid-sized car with an engine thatâ€™s larger and more powerful than average. Generally, a muscle car is a two-door vehicle thatâ€™s designed for high-performance driving. It uses the V8 engine which is the same engine widely used by motor sport vehicles in NASCAR or F1 competitions. That is how powerful a muscle car is.

In the US, muscle cars were built around the early 1960s. This began a general trend in vehicles geared towards factory performance cars or cars that are tuned to perform better than standard models. The racing enthusiasts among younger drivers were its target market. The main selling point of muscle cars was it offered the burgeoning young driving population with vehicles that were reasonably affordable and had the same speed and strength as the popular race cars.

Competition between muscle car manufacturers rose, and they built stronger, bigger and more luxurious models to cope up with the demand. Since they were better versions of the original muscle cars, they were priced higher. This however, led to a decline in muscle car interest since muscle cars were built to be affordable in the first place. During the decline, various car manufacturers decided to build separate expensive and affordable muscle car models.

It wasnâ€™t long before other countries started taking an interest in muscle cars. Soon car manufacturers in countries like Australia, UK and Japan started their own line of muscle cars. The shape of the muscle car also evolved. From a two-door, coupe-type vehicle, they became four-door muscle cars, as well as pickups.
