Furniture repair London explained by Julia Roger

Article published on March 17th 2012 | Home Improvement

Furniture repair London may seem like a niche industry to you but in reality a professional in that line of work can make a good living thanks to a high amount of demand for their services. An expert in the building, restoration and fixing of furniture will rarely be short of work so here is a quick introduction to the trade:

The furniture repair London game is a varied, challenging and rewarding one. It is perhaps most similar to carpentry in the skills that are required. For instance a substantial amount of wood finishing is needed on the likes of chests of drawers. However furniture repair London also includes tasks like reupholstering so a specialist has to be adept at all manner of things. French polishing is another exacting practice which is commonly undertaken by qualified furniture repairers. Of course when it comes to furniture repair London aesthetics are very important so a great deal of meticulous preparation and an attention to detail is necessary.

Of course furniture repair London is something that is more applicable to antique pieces than contemporary items. For instance a flat-pack wardrobe made of laminated chipboard is not worth the effort and cost of having work undertaken on it by a qualified professional. However a handcrafted Victorian rocking chair or grand mahogany dining room table is certainly worth the effort. Therefore antique furniture repair forms the bulk of the projects done by furniture repair London specialists. Treasured family heirlooms which are very much staying in the same home as well as things bought by dealers and being readied for the auction room are commonly worked on.

All in all furniture repair London is a demanding and valued profession which you will be thankful if you have a fine piece of furniture which needs to be restored to its former glory.
