For some novice homeowners, window replacement projects may sound a little strange. After all, as long as the window is up there and doing what it's supposed to do, nothing can possibly go wrong, right? In reality, windows are regularly at risk of deterioration because they are often exposed to different weather conditions.

Windows maintain comfortable room temperatures since they keep the chills out in the winter and the warmth out in the summer. However, once a window has aged and deteriorated, it allows heat to pass through, a major contributing factor to heat loss and gain. Inefficient windows can increase a household's utility bill by as much as 30 percent. Looking at it closely, it's like throwing $90 out the window, money which could have been spent on more essential things.

If you're looking for a valid reason to push through with a window replacement project, then you'll be glad to know that replacing old windows can increase your home's value. The National Association of Realtors estimates that replacement windows offer a 97 percent return on investments. It's a win-win situation for homeowners as they get to live more comfortably without paying a heavy price.

The best time of the year to consider replacing windows is around spring or fall, the reason being you'll have to tear down your old windows apart. This would leave your home partially vulnerable to the elements for a day or two. Naturally, you would want to avoid hot summers and frigid winters as much as possible.
