If you are standing at the threshold of becoming a police officer then you will find yourself about to take a few tests. This is one of the basic requirement to getting into police training. Though the test is not that difficult, many people do not pass in the first go. Preparing for the test is very important. This means that weeks or even a couple of months before the exam, read as much as you can. While you should be brushing up on the workings of your neighborhood and state, you should also check out as many police exam guides of repute as you can. Do not stress yourself out about the exam, and give yourself time to sort things out.

Make sure you know well in advance where your test center is going to be and chart out how you plan to get there. Do not be late on the day of your test. Giving it a few test runs would be a good idea. When you get there, make sure that you act professionally. Try not being loud and act overly smart. It would do good to dress up semi-formal. You do not want to be turned away by recruitment officers at the door.

The main parts of the exam itself are the vocabulary and comprehension parts. The math section is rather basic and will involve fractions and percentages. With the comprehension, try and read the answer options given first and then go back to the paragraph and read it. It will help you understand this clearly and give you clarity on the right answers.

As far as spelling goes, almost everybody feels that they are rather good at it and that they are going to sail through the test. However, you are in a test situation and tension can get the best of you. Spellings given are the tricky kinds like that of Lieutenant and deceased and the like. All your attention should be on suffixes such as ent, ant and the like.

Go through as many guides as you can to give you an idea of how to handle the tests. Once you are sure of this, you will at least know how to pace yourself when you are actually answering the exam. Try and remain calm and collected throughout. The test is just a simple part of testing how you work under pressure since there is a lot of it that the job entails.
