Chancellor George Osborne Should Tax Up for Growth by Jacob Lender

Article published on August 23rd 2012 | Loans

In a series of the involvements to be in print in The Daily Telegraph in the last week, leading to the demands of the economists to take some kind of radical action from the side of the Chancellor George Osborne in order to boost the growth of the economy, things were gradually taking up the shape.

The Chancellor in the present times is very already under very much of pressure in order to reduce the public spending to a further amount, with the wellbeing budget ear-marked for an extra amount of somewhere around 10 billion pounds worth of cuts. Nevertheless the opinion amongst the leading economists of the country appears to be aligning in favor of the measures in order to encourage the growth, which was inclusive of cuts in the taxes as well as in the major projects that are related to the infrastructure of the UK.

The new official of the figures of the growth that were released in the last week is very much expected to confirm that Britain remained in the problem of recession between the month of April and June, after the economy had started shrinking again the last autumn season of the year 2011.

The pieces of the opinion pieces in one of the newspapers in the last week will be including in the contributions from the side of Paul Johnson, who is the director of the Institute for Fiscal Studies, as well as Andrew Sentence who us a former member of the Monetary Policy Committee of the Bank of England. They will also be adding up to the growing swell of opinion of the formers arguing for a Plan B as the recovery of the United Kingdom from the financial crisis that had come in the year 2008 is very much slower than what the ministers had hoped it will be. Johnson was of the view that the regimes of the planning required a proper amount of reformation, as well as had described stamp duty is among the most unproductive taxes we have. Sentence who also is the senior economic adviser to PricewaterhouseCoopers, wrote that a bolder course is needed in this very regard.
