Debts and Economy - Imperfect relationship - true or not by Ryan Gains

Article published on January 12th 2012 | Loans

Debts and economy go hand in hand. As the economy of the country is going a little low, the PM, David Cameron, asked all to settle off their debts but he does not that this is not going to help on a large scale. People borrowing money and then some of them becoming debtors is a part of every economy. Some feel that if people would be debtors or defaulters the demand would rise and there would be a positive effect. On the other hand, some feel that when the citizens of the country, there are negative effect on the economy of any country. Prime Minister, David Cameron, a few months back gave a speech that everyone should pay back their debts.

It was taken up as a politics from good thinkers but the effect one economy would be negative. It should be seen in this way that if everyone would pay debts and would start saving from where will demand would come? It is being said that his thoughts about economy was not so strong. Being the prime minister of the country, he just wanted to tell all the citizens as well as the government that it was just the right time not only for them but also for the economy of the country that they clear off their debts. As the country was going to a kind of imbalance, it was a little necessary.

From the past ten years, the people of Britain had started borrowing quite a log of money. And during this decade the debts on the households increased manifolds due to the rise in the domestic products. One of the difficult things to handle is the debt levels of the private sector. Thus people as well as the government both are sailing in the same boat. If the customers that are the people paid off all their debts at a faster pace, the condition of the economy would still get down even more. The official numbers show that the growth of economy has been extremely slow in 2011, even more than 2011. Actually the government also realizes the reality and dilemma that the country is going through at the present time. Thus, they are pleading that is asking countries with better economies such as Germany, Japan as well as China to try and increase the domestic demands so that the deficit in their own country improves.
