The landline providers that Home Phone Online has chosen to provide information for are BT home phone, Orange home phone, Post Office home phone, O2 home phone, Talk Talk home phone and Sky Talk. The website lists the main contracts customers can take advantage of for each company and also includes some of the benefits for customers of choosing a particular company, such as the way money can be saved when your O2 home phone bill is bundled with O2 broadband or free weekend international calls with the Post Office home phone deal.

The website also offers a plethora of practical information in terms of switching phone provider, as well as extolling the benefits of cable phone lines as opposed to a telegraph-based landline - because cables are laid underground or on the sea bed so very little can disrupt the quality of their service, as opposed to telegraphs which are affected by weather. Most of all, though, it ensures that customers are fully aware of the most important factors to consider when choosing a provider, such as the line rental cost and the prices of day calls, as this is where many companies make their money - because evening and weekend calls are heavily discounted or completely free, companies tend to charge a lot to make daytime calls from their landlines.

Home Phone Online also encourages customers to use Internet calling wherever possible as it is cheaper overall than using the landline. It is still possible to use a telephone handset and call from the landline number, but it will cost less and you can even use a webcam to see the person you're talking to on your computer screen.

It's only when it comes to actually sorting out a landline that people realize it is not as simple as it looks in terms of choosing a good deal. By comparing the top providers on the Home Phone Online website, you can bypass the less reputable providers and choose from only the best deals. With their advice and help on setting up a landline and switching providers, they can help you negotiate the minefield of landline providers and set up your landline in an entirely stress-free way.
