If you aspire to be a published author in African American market by Sofen

Article published on January 14th 2012 | Poetry

You have been a book worm since childhood. You have been glued to Nancy Drew, Enid Blyton, Mark Twain's Stories of Tom Sawyer, Famous Five and many more. You have been a voracious reader and read out anything and everything you got from daily newspaper to scientific journals to fashion magazines. You love the most romantic stories you also enjoyed the murder thrillers. You lived in your own fantasy world in your years of growing up! Then there was this real world you had to face as a young adult. You had all your share of good as well as bad and ugly experiences in life. You had seen the most respectable person breaking your trust, heinous crime being committed by honorable persons, you experienced the wonderful feeling of love, you felt responsible towards your parents the first time and made them move to tears. All these emotions have enriched you, made you a more emotionally poised person.

It is also the perfect cocktail to reap the seeds of penning your thoughts and become an author in you. You have written down something for the first time and was satisfied to read it out in your close circle. They have praised, given suggestions, poured in constructive criticism. A smaller cousin is so impressed, she wants you to get published, your father thinks you need to mature further to get published. You have written and rewritten words. Starting with short stories you have moved on to poetry or essays. You have improved on your art and you have indeed perfected your art. Now when you read your creations in close circles, there is more praise than criticism, more clapping than yawning.
